As a coop student I was allowed to have much more hands-on experience with the network and equipment than many coop students. I completed a few workstation deployments, almost entirely solo. I was also able to troubleshoot and repair some major outages (including hardware and software) by myself with little help from my supervisors. These systems were entirely Microsoft systems, though I often used Linux to troubleshoot and repair systems

In this position I worked as temporary help for my father's not-for-profit company doing a wide variety of tasks including general services and special events set-up. I also helped their network administrator with workstation maintenance during my time home from school.
